For the past two trying to secure justice and protection for or three days the Democrats have been our road But what is that to do with work ng like beavers This work has been quietly done but if they find any lack of interest on the part of the Republicans tofaj, or any evidence o over confidence, they will take advantage of it by rushing in their full vote at the ast minute they have plenty money to work with and any one who imagines that they propose to let the efection go by default is making a big mistake The Republicans have it in the riower to baulk asy and every effort that may be put forth by the opposition, ture as the two references at has already but it can only be dore by going to the nolls. Let our friends monliest the same pterest that has marked their action in the various cracases and devote this day ib (it) There is work for all and it should be cheerfully given in the interest of good government The Maine cities generally where elections have already been held this spring have shown splendid Republic in victories and Bangor houll new swell the chorus Phe only together and it will be Mayor clance of the Democrats is based on the

The above named words are Democratic stamping ground, but the Republicans should make every vote count. In Two the Democrats have experienced no little trouble in securing candidates and it is and the best of feeling does not exist We are informed that Mr. Cassidy's name was withdrawn to prevent the outbreak of i factional quarrel and that Mr Thaver was a compromise cardidate, the name of (apt i J Stewart having been mentioned, and your eloquent address delivered at but the suggestion of his nomination our Second Annual Banquet, on February but the suggestion, of his nomination caused dissatisfaction, in the lower end of the ward. Then it was found, as we are informed, that a Republican had been nominated as a candicate for Councilman, the discovery being made yesterday, so that a new name will have to be put upon the ticket this morning. All this backing and filling has caused opsiderable friction, which may manifest tiself to-day. However this may be the Republicans should have every one of their votes at the polls banner Repub ican majority noeass boog at

Solid Republican work will carry the day

Wards Three, Four, Five and Six The Republicans o the first three wards should see which car roll up the largest majority for the Republican ticket to-day These wards are counted upon to furnish the great bulk of the majority for the head of the ticket and should each give Mr Bragg a big vote Let every Republican impress upon his neighbor the necessity of getting to the polls early as such a course committees Ward Six Republicans will doubtless do their whole duty to-day as usual The more stubborn the opposition the better it will be for the Republicans send back the word to our friends in other portions of the State that the Queen City still stands in the Republican colunin by a large majority.

The Democrats of Ward Seven propose to make a desperate effort to-day to re-ciam what has for some years prior to last spring theen regarded as a Democratic stronghold If the Republicans retain the advantage gained last year it will be a splendid victory and one worth a deal of hard work It is a fight in the enemy's country, and while the election of Mr. Conners would be of little significance in a ward that is usually held as solid for a Democraticimajority, his defeat would be a great victory for the Republicans of the ward The fact that the Democrats set aside their candidate of last year to bring forward a stronger man shows that they reside the necessity of hard work this spring. Let the Kepublicans of the ward rally around their candidates to a man and

The Young Mer.

The young men should take an active part in the election to day They have received most gratifying recognition in the nomination of one of our most popular young business men as the Republican candidate for Mayor and they should give him their most eithusiastic support at the polis Remember that these early contexts are preparatory for the great buttle in 1888 when Maine will lead off in the line of victories that will result in placing a Republican in the White House once agair, and forthermore that all ind cations now point to Maine's distinguished citizen as the Republican standard bearier in the cortest Let Bangor's young men help rolup a good majority and increase it next year nomination of one of our most popular appointed young business men as the Republican Jadge

What Does It Mean?

Our evening contemporary has waked up long enough to remark that Alderman Mulvaney is not unknown to the people of Bangor and that he has been at Augusta fight og in behalf of the rights of the city Well, what if he has? So has Mr Baugor, all of whom are entitled to credit for the deep interest they have shown in tion as we said once before is entirely outside of politics, Republicans and Den ocrats working together for a common the commutatees purpose, and this effort of the Commercial somehow floure out a little capital for the Democratic candidate who was one of a large delegation to visit Augusta is su premely ridiculous Does our contem porary intend to convey the impress on that Mr Mulvaney simply went to Augusta as a Democrat seeking votes? If not it better leave this rai road question out of its political paragraphs in the fu made, are not destined to help its cand; date, who, we believe, was not actuated by the thoroughly selfish purpose the Conmercial intimates if its affusions to the subject mean anything

A STRANGE TESTIMONY. (Concluded.)

"I have sone books from the east in a box there on the table; you must look them over," he began, and then he dr! "ted into the sem-scientific chatter—I can give it no more dignified title—in which we so often adulged. We laugheft a good deal over the erratic, insane theories which the late advances in electricity had sent, like so many electric shocks, over the world, and Westhaven drew me out nt some length on the subject of electrical magnetism as appled to individuals. He looked a out for his eigar case and went out of the room to find it. After waiting a few min ites for his return I walked over to the table to have a glance at the over to the table to have a glance at the new books. There were two boxes upon it, one nearly concealed by a pile of papers, and this one I opened. Beneath a layer of paper I found several coils of insulated wirk and portions of a magneto-electric battery. Westhaven entered the work and I can led to him:

insulated wire and portions of a magneto-electric battery. Westhaven entered the room and I ca.led to him:

"I am in the wrong box."

He uttered a hearts cry and sprang toward me, suddenly checking himself and endeavoring to master what ap-peared to me an unaccountable agita-tion II.s emotion was too apparent for either of us to comp etely ignore it and I felt compelled to turn away and pre-tend to be engrossed in the contents of the other box until he could recover him-self. Selecting a magazine, I went away the other box intil he could recover him-self. Selecting a magazine, I went away immed ately, considerably amazed at my stupid mistaka, yet more puzzled over the agrication thad caused him. So sim-ple a discovery as that of finding in the possession of a man who openly avowed his interest in electrical studies on instru-ment constant y in vague among a deets! ment constant, y in vogue amon y electric claps was not in itself sufficient uterly co-confuse the possessor. But then West-bayen was a queer fellow. He possibly did not wish ne to know that he experimented; or perhaps he was inventing something. And I cast the whole affair off my mind with a laugh.

something. And I cast the whole affair off py mind with a laugh.

The uext day neither Mrs. Westhaven nor Miss Carlyon was at breakfast. Miss Carlyon was not well, Westhaven said, and to this I attributed his moody silence and strings, excited manner. He did not appear litrough the day, and, coitrary to my custom, I went to his rooms in the afternoon to inquire for the itrailed. I found the door open and was entering the parter when a voice from, the inner room fell upon my can. Westhaven was speaking harshly and rapidly: "Comal It is time! Come! I say!"

A woman's ivolce, Mrs. Westhaven's I fancied, mouded and protested faintly. Another imperitive command from Westhaven, followed by a curse, then the sound of some heavy body dragged a little way across the room, a door shut sharply and all' was still. I turned and hurried from the room, conscious that I had already stayed too long, thankful that my presence had not been suspected by the tomates. I went directly to my own room to gead, and tried to dismiss the circumstance from my thoughts. Westhaven's harsh voice and the pitffil moan which answered it had impressed me strongly. I was most unwilling to believe him cap ble of physical crueity to his wife, yet him we thow went down stairs; it was nearly diner time. Miss Carlyon

I dressed slowly and went down stairs: I dressed slowly and went down states; it was nearly dinner time. Miss Carlyon was sitting on the versueda. She looked brighter and prettier than I had ever seen her. Her improvement was laily noticeable, and to night her cleeks flushed with deleate and becoming color. flushed with del_cate and becoming color. She was quite unembarrassed and glad to talk with me. She said she alept all the afternoon and her indisposition of the morning was siruly the result of a sleepless night. She had not been present then, I conclude girnly, at the wife beating. Presently Mrs. Westhaven came out and joined us. She seemed pulo and exhausted. For the first time I noticed a marked resemblance between the sisters.

1 noticed a markes resembates between the sisters.

"You find the heat oppressive, do you not?" I asked her, and her reply betrayed an agitation and an farmestness of which I had believed her manner inwhich I had b lieved her manner incapable.

"Oh, yes " she said, laying her hand on her heart as if she suffered there.

"Yes, indeed, it burns me—it burns me territhj."

She seemed to be desperately iil.

I saw little of Westhaven for days after this. It is possible that my manner to him may not have been cordial. I could not help a certain restraint, and I am sure that for any lie he avoided me. This in time wore away, and we resumed our former pleasant relations, there being nothing to excite even further curiosity in his domestic affairs.

Mrs. Westhaven steadily drooped, los-

in his domestic a Tairs.

Mrs. Westhaven steadily drooped, losing fiesh and cobr, which Miss Carlyon as steadily gained. The winter was nearly over. Westhaven and I had discussed the change in his wife, but it came so gradually that he seemed not to notice it as I did. One night he came to my door.

my door.
"Doctor," he said, "I wish you would come and see Mrs. Westhaven. She is not at all well." I rose hurried y and went upstairs with him. He seemed greatly distressed and quite unnerved, searcely answering the questions I put to binn concerning the nature of the attack. I found Miss Carelyon attending beside the the bed upon which Mrs. Westh vere lay, white, limp, utterly unlike terself. She smiled faintly when I add sessed her, but I could faintly when I add sessed her, but I could utterly unlike terself, the faintly when I addressed her. faintly when I add essed her, but I could not induce her to speak to mo. She looked to me like a person who had re-ceived a guiden and severe shock. I asked Miss Carlyon where Mrs. West-haven had passed the afternoon. She replied that her sister had gone out alone and returned just before dinner, appar-ently very much exhausted; she had been in this condition all the evening. Miss Carlyon's voice was cold and strained, and her restless eyes traveled the room over as she spoke to me. Westhaven watched her every word anxionsly. I had not believed him capa-westnaven watered her every word anxiously. I had not believed him capa-ble of such deep feeling for his unitoved wife. I administered a sleeping draug it and left the room, followed by Westhaven. I turned to speak to him. He stood before me like a desperate, huntred an mal, and there flushed neross me a an mal, and there flashed neross me a sudden, horrible suspicion that he was in some way connected with his wife's illness. An instant's swift reflection convinced me of my injustice—her symptoms were not those of a person to whom an injurious drug has been given, and the remorse I felt colored my manner to h m with even greater Mudness.

So I gave him an opinion which was the result more of weeks of chearact an

the result more of weeks of observat on than of my visit if at evening to the pa-tient. "Frankly, i will tell you," I sad, "that I think Mrs. Westhaven will eventtient. "Frankly, i will tell you," I said, "that I think Mrs. Westhaven will event ually succumb to the same illness which attacked her sister. Three months ago I would have refuted this theory as unkenable in view of her superabundant vitality, but to the eyes of a stranger it is possibly more apparent than to her family, to you, that she is vory much changed in health and appearance." I paused.
Westhaven drew his breath in short, dry gasps. His hands moved restlessly along the back of a chair before him.
"Do you think my wife will die!"
I scarcely recogn zed his voice. I replied gently:
"Not necessarily to. A change of climate has effected much in the case of Miss Carlyon; she is certainly a different person from what she was when I first saw her. In fact," I added reflective y,
"Miss Carlyon has gained in almost exact proportion to Mrs. Westhaven's loss."

Westhaven started violently. His Loe

Westhaven started violently. His fice grew livid. He regarded me: with a strange expression, one which I could not fathom. I continued quietly:

"I should give Mrs. Westhaven no medicines. If she does not improve you must take her back to the east. Miss Carlyon need not be considered; I believe her to be quite restored to health?"

Carlyon need not be considered. I believe her to be quite restored to health?

If think no one ever impressed me so disagreeably as Miss Carlyon: at this poriod. She had recovered her health in a most extraordinary way, but it seemed to bring her neither happiness nor good temper. It was impossable to converse with her upon the most trivial topis.
Her capitalous temperament was wearisome in the extreme and her indifference to her slater utterly repulsive. Westhaven was oblivious to it. Whatever was the fascination she exerted over hir, he was quite subservient to the spell. She cling persistently to his side and monopolised the time and attention which should have been given for hamistic's sake to his wife.

—he was in despair. His wife, he said, was much better. I did not know what to advise. I was not a practicing physician, and I had come to the firm conclusion that I had best not meddle with a complicated and perplexing hereditary trouble which promised no successful cure. I preferred not to advise at all, but promised to see them in the evening. Westlawer-left me dejectedly.

I saw nothing of him through the day and toward 3 o'clock in the afternoon I reproached myself for what might seem to him an unpardonable nadifference on my part; and, on an impulse, I want directly to his rooms. The day was insufferably hot. There were few guests in the hotel, the season was well over and no one was visible in the cortidors. There was not a sound save the sphashing of a fountain which played in the court below, cooling the air deliciously. I walked lazily atong the gallery, gazing upward at the bit of blue sky above the open court, intensely blue as only a tropical sky can be.

I suddenly phused, transfixed, incaping the gardenty phused, transfixed, incaping the states of t court, intensely blue as only a tropical sky can be.

I suddenly paused, transfixed, incapable of further motion. I istood before a door lepiding into an inmer sitting room of Westhaven's, a room which I bad entered but once, which I believed he used for a s'ndy. The large glass ventilator above the door was swung partially open, and tipped at such an angle that the interior of the room, glowing in the flere sunlight which poured rite it through the open window, was reflected with the fatal detailed reproduction of photography, upon the surface of the glass.

Every detail of its horrible revelation was burned upon my brain in an instant:

Upor, a long table before the window through which the sun beat hotly, lay a long, glass case, with convex sides, and within this uncovered case, livid, ghastly, unconscious, lay Mrs. Westhaven. Her face was drawn by an expression of terrible agony, her ilmbs were rigid, her hands clonched convulsively, her beautiful, white breast was bare. The blazing rays of the sun concentrated by the strong lens formed by the convex side of the case threw the spectrum directly over her heart. She was absolutely motionless:

case threw the spectrum directly over her heart. She was absolutely motionless; I could not see even that she breathed. Just where the actinic rays of the spec-trum fell upon her soft skin, those mys-terious may whose territies chemical. trum fell upon her soit skin, inose mys-terious rays, whose terrible chemical power has yet to be fathomed, were placed two fine glass tubes connecting with a magneto electric battery by the side of the case, manipulated by West-

His face I could not see; it was bent His face I could not see; it was bent over the body of his wife; his whole attitude breathed a desperate and fearful anxiety. Through those delicate; tubes flowed a something, ultra etheric, the faintest aurora, and passing into the battery was transmitted by means of cannecting wires to the hands of Miss Carlyon, who, scatter almost directly beneath the ventilities held the hands of of the heting wires to the hands of Miss Christon, who, seated almost directly beneath the ventilator, I eld the handles of the battery firmly in her grasp. Her head was thrown back, her face was clearly reflected above me, her eyes were shining, her breath came quickly. The silence of death was in the room; I folt the painful excitement of the scientist pending a dangerous experiment.

I could have shricked a oud a nervous horror, but I seemed to have lost the power of a ticulation. I felt sure that this oltra etheric matter was vital fluid, the very essence of life. It must be conveyed by only force engendered by the immeasurable power of the actinic rays. Then a fouldmender was being committed in this room by a process of inconceivable torture! As I stood there, powerless, punetrating to the depths, the secret intended to be hid from all the world, memory pictured each scene of the tragency with hed height process. ory pictured each seene of the trag-edy which had been enacted before me, from the one which the curtain had long since rung down on to this last one so nearly at a close.

I recalled the beautiful, blooming, senseless woman who had come in the early winter to California and the little, early winter to California and the little, delicate, dying sister, and the disappointed, tortured, unlaying husband. I remembered the process of change so subtity, so delicately treated by which the condition of these two women had been reversed. I remembered the feverish anxiety with which the man had watched and guardet the change, his mysterious and baffling nature, his surprising fondness for my society and the greed with which he had drawn from me and dewhich he had drawn from me and devoured my theories upon such very subjects. My God! Had I, it deed, suggested to him the means by which to work his hellish purpose? Like fire in my blood this thought burned me at last to action. I forced open the door. Miss Carlyon raised her eyes, wide, saring, horrible, and saw me. She made no sound in her terror. Westhaven was completely engrossed in his ghastly work; his head was turned away. Suddenly he uttered an artful ery. There was a quick shudder through the helpless figure in the glass case; the little glass tubes over the heart glowed with an intensiled crimson light which flickered an instant, then went out. A violent shock agitated the battery beneath Westhaven's hands, there was a sudden shattering of glass, a swift, blinding flash of brilliant, incandescent light. When I unclosed my dazzled eyes Miss Carlyon lay, face downward upon the floor. I knew what had happened. The last vital spark had been exhausted and the vampire who sacked this life had drawn death with it. Westhaven stared at me with terrible, vacant eyes. He seemed stunned. I unlocked the door, spurning the figure of the which he had drawn from me and de-

She was quite dead.
I went down to the office.
"Something is wrong in Mr. West-haven's room." I said to the hotel proprietor, as quietly as I could. "You will do well to go and see about it."

The next time that I met Mr. West-haven I was called as a witness for the state in his trial. I repeated substantially the testimony which I have given above, the testimony which I have given above, but did not state my 'ncleif that Mr. Westhaven had been it; love with his wife's sister. There were hosts of witnesses to testify to the affectionate solicitude which he had ever shown for the health of both ladies since their arrival in California. He was acquitted, the jury probably holding the opinion that Mr. Westhaven had merely gratified his love of setortific experience. love of scientific experiment with the best intentions, though with fatal results. —Philadelphia Press.

ALL MEDICAL AUTHORITIES

Agree that catarrh is no more not less than an infimmation of the lining membrane of the nasal air passages.

Nasal catarrh and all catarrhal affection
of the head are not diseases of the blood, and it is a serious mistake to treat them as such. No conscientious physician ever attempts to do so.

It is held by eminent medical men that sooner or later a specific will be found for every disease from which humanity suffers. The facts justify us in assuming that for catarrh at least a positive sure already exists in Ely's Cream Balm.
